8. Main Content

The draft Gambling (Licensing & Advertising) Bill was notified by the UK on 3 December 2012 (Notification 2012/673/UK). As already notified, the bill extends the category of remote gambling operators who will require a remote gambling operating licence to include all remote gambling operators (whether based domestically or abroad) who make their remote gambling products available to consumers in GB or advertise their remote gambling services to consumers in GB. Those operators will be required to pay operating licence fees and expected to contribute to research, education and treatment in relation to British problem gambling.

The bill is being re-notified as it has been amended since its initial notification. It has been amended to:

- restrict the new licensing requirement to remote gambling operators who know or should know their facilities are being used, or would be used by consumers in GB, rather than those operators whose facilities are 'capable of being used' by consumers in GB; and
- introduce a new offence of advertising unlicensed remote gambling in Northern Ireland which brings Northern Ireland into line with the position in relation to the advertising of remote gambling that applies in GB.

9. Brief Statement of Grounds

As already notified, the extension of the licensing requirements is a necessary measure to ensure the effective protection of all British based consumers of remote gambling products. Consumers in Great Britain currently face different consumer protection arrangements, and have to deal with different regulators, depending on where the remote gambling they are taking part in is regulated. This problem is growing as more countries permit online gambling.

The Bill will simplify remote gambling regulation in Great Britain by shifting regulation from the 'point of supply' to the 'point of consumption'. As above, the effect of this is that all operators who transact with consumers based in Great Britain or advertise to British based consumers where the gambling advertised would require an operating licence from the Gambling Commission will require an operating licence regardless of where they are located. These operators will therefore be subject to the robust and consistent regulation by the Gambling Commission, increasing protection for British based consumers and supporting action against illegal activity (including sports betting integrity).

The UK's detailed grounds are contained in basic texts and the UK's responses to the Commission and Detailed Opinion submitted by Malta in Notification 2012/673/UK.
